Don't Be Hoodwinked

By Felecia Scott

Black People Don't Read is one of those books that you read from cover to cover but in the process you are analyzing all of the numerical data surrounding each theory. What I loved the most about the book is when Janks said, "Never trust a Man (or woman) who quotes a statistic that ends in either five or zero." Wow that is definitely real talk. By the way this quote is taken from the chapter entitled Hoodwinked. Another highlight of the book is it reads as if Janks and Ivory are having an open discussion with everyone. Call and response is all I can say.

A word from one of the Editors

By Gil Trotman

I volunteered to help proof this title after seeing how provocative the truth about the state of Black America can be firsthand on Facebook when the Author Janks Morton started posting pictograms from his Film Production "Hoodwinked" which is available now on Amazon and is premiering in a few select venues around the country. This book, a companion piece to the movie, actually came about because of how much the information it contains provoked people to express their views. The following are my comments regarding the title which I believe succinctly provides an adequate review.

I like to look at the title as a double entendre. firstly, the stereotypes "Black People Don't Read", "Black People Don't Swim", etc. are all meant to demean us, but more importantly change how we view our selves, to collectively lower our self-esteem, and to negatively affect how the rest of the world sees us. In this book Mr. Morton very directly and with extensive attention to detail, dispels the lies and equips us to spread the truth with facts from established and credentialed sources, including the very government and media who misinterprets and conveniently omits or manipulates this data.

The second possible meaning is as a warning because many of us Black People have allowed our minds to be conditioned and lulled to sleep with grim lullabies for so long that they now find the inferior stereotypes comforting and cling to them with ferocity and if you are one of those "Black People Don't Read" this book! But truthfully, I only helped in the editing; and for the real insight I, of course, defer completely to the author and I know he has already explained the choice of title many times. What sticks out most in my memory from his explanations, is that the title should shock and provoke you to action (so long as that action is not to judge this cover by your own preconceived notion of what it means and read the pages to truly find out). I think it's a great title for a profoundly necessary book. Once again, KUDOS! to my friend Janks Morton on a great companion piece to your profoundly necessary productions! Thank you for your efforts at uplifting our peoples!

I am expecting to receive a signed copy as a gift for helping with the editing/proofreading but I wanted to buy a copy myself to help support not only the author of this important book but the ideals he promotes, as I said earlier, herein and in the movie currently playing "Hoodwinked", to which this book is an accompaniment. The movie and the book both brilliantly dispel the lies about the black man and woman presented by the media and special interests, and Janks Morton and Dr. Ivory Toldson powerfully and compellingly present the true data and statistics and explains where and how it is misused and misinterpreted (intentionally or unintentionally/maliciously or benignly) to promulgate black inferiority, and how all of us unwarily eat it up. This is a powerful documentary that will at worst enlighten and entertain you and at best will motivate you towards introspection and corrective action with the empowerment of truth. Kudos to Janks Morton for being a powerful motivator and activist in the truest sense!

Don't Let the Title Mislead You

By Cynthia P. White, Ed. D.

Black People Don't Read is the definitive guide for dispelling the myths that are so pervasive in our society regarding Black people. Specifically the book addresses and disputes with statistical data the negativity surrounding the lives of African Americans, particularly African American males. If we listen to the media and believe only what is spoon-fed to us, then we would further perpetuate those same myths about our own people. Some of those myths include there being more Black men incarcerated than enrolled in colleges and universities. The data comes from U.S. Census Bureau, the Department of Justice, Department of Education as well as other agencies that provide statistics on the state of Black people in America. Authors, Dr. Ivory Toldson and Janks Morton more than adequately refute the preponderance of distorted information which chips away at the psyche and identity of black men. Black People Don't Read is a vehicle for positive conversations about the achievements of African American males that are somehow overlooked by the media.
