A large, regional book on the topic of superstition

By Dennis Hendrix

This book has 3,954 numbered superstitions and folk beliefs and is therefore one of the larger books on the topic. The author collected these beliefs by having school students submit them, and they were also submitted from various people throughout the state. With most beliefs in this book the citation is something simply like "Western Kentucky," "Blue Grass" or "Mountains." This book has a similar feel of "Ray Browne's "Popular Beliefs and Practices from Alabama" which has only slightly more superstitions. Also, while both this and Browne's book are large, they're notably smaller than some of the biggest texts written on the subject. However, Browne's book cites whether the beliefs listed in his book correlate with those in other books, while here we don't get that advantage.
